I would never ask this question, but someone told me to learn "numerical methods" in my graduate programme. Anyway, that is another story. Let's be specific. You are here to find answers, to look for the right knowledge sources. I will try to help, but my recommendations are based upon my personal experience. And that is also a story. My recommendations are based upon past experience, but I do know the struggles that you are going to face with this education. Anyway, some hints: there are plenty of books, articles, articles... Many people are afraid to learn statistics. The main reason for this is that people believe that you need to know real mathematics for this. The second reason is that this material is related with computers, and this is obscure to most people. The third reason is that the results obtained are false, and that is not always true. There are many important papers in this field. Some say that all you need is to be able to integrate for one variable. Others say that you need to have knowledge of calculus. I have never heard the third version... How could you obtain a good job if you do not know any of these things? Personally, I have been studying statistics for about 10 years. I have studied some of them independently. The main problems that I have encountered are: the very difficult hypothesis testing. This process is based on a statistician hypothesis that cannot be proven, yet. You need to take a lot of samples. This stuff is so difficult to study, you need to study as much as you can. Every day it gets harder to get the answers you need. I have also had to learn all the statistical families: like normal dist
