Google's PRISM leaks, now what? - timf ===== aaronbrethorst Grossly sensationalist headline, and garbled content at that. Google is "reeling" from PRISM? "Google wants to roll back its massive data collection program" is a more accurate statement. ~~~ benologist I don't think _that_ how it's being described though... ~~~ eli The author is clearly talking about end-to-end encryption. ----- BHSPitMonkey > Google's PRISM leaks, now what? I'm not sure how the leakers can change the PRISM program. Either way, the leakers are idiots for putting all this information out there. I'll leave it to Google to decide whether to go the route of "destroy everything" and obliterate the data from the database server. If Google really was so suspicious, they could use the data they captured and only keep it for as long as they wanted (say, for a few days), and then purge it (saying it's because of some unwise choice to keep it indefinitely) before ever letting the public know that they have any in the first place. ~~~ bruceb I'm not sure about the content of the leaks and how one could change it but taking it offline (at least for a few days) would certainly give the best chance of diffusing the situation. ~~~ pitdesi This has been suggested, but I wouldn't expect it to work. If the data is important enough to be a scandal, then there will be some legal action. Google's name would be on any paperwork of activities like these. ----- jamesrom Off topic: I think Gawker's site design is terrible. I can
