Nerve agents and pesticides such as VX are considered chemical weapons and their detection is an important component of the Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) risk and evaluation process. We demonstrate here the use of porous glass (PG) to screen nerve agents such as VX, Sarin and tabun in the vapor and gaseous state. The porous glass micro-plate was exposed to vapors of these nerve agents (0.10-30 ppm), and the color change of the micro-plate upon nerve agent poisoning was monitored. The sensitivity of the PG micro-plate method is satisfactory and the method can be done almost instantaneously. The porous glass micro-plate results were compared with conventional chromatographic methods, gas chromatography-mass spectroscopy (GC-MS) with confirmatory analysis, and
