Like many other commercial CAD and drafting software applications, AutoCAD is still going strong today, and is still popular, as companies continue to rely on this type of software to maintain production facilities. In this article, we provide an overview of the history of AutoCAD, and also explore the various ways in which companies use AutoCAD in the course of their daily business. AutoCAD from Beginnings to 2017 AutoCAD was originally conceived by Michel Desmurget, who served as the co-creator of AutoCAD. Desmurget and Fred A. Haas, also of Autodesk, first published the concept of the application on 3 October 1982, after Desmurget finished his Ph.D. dissertation at the Ecole Nationale Supérieure des Mines de Paris, France. During the early years, the name AutoCAD was chosen to "define the concept, while 'Autocad' [was] reserved for the later releases", according to Desmurget's official website. AutoCAD was originally available for the Apple IIe computer only. Fred A. Haas, also the co-founder and CEO of Autodesk, explains the creation of AutoCAD on his official website: "The concept for AutoCAD originated when Fred Haas (then a product manager at Palo Alto) and I were observing a process at a foundry that we worked with in France. The process involved sending out a worker into a complex building site to bring back raw metal pieces to be cast into larger pieces. The worker would climb a ladder to the top of a scaffolding, reach the top of a wall of the foundry, walk a ladder to the other side of the wall and then walk a ladder to reach a large platform that held large pieces. Each time the worker would have to climb a ladder, first to reach the building, then to reach the scaffolding, and then to reach the wall of the foundry, then to reach the top of the wall, then to reach the platform on the other side of the wall. At the platform, the worker would lower a mechanical arm that would pick up the piece of metal. The worker would then climb another ladder to the platform. The process was time-consuming and dangerous. There were several workers in the foundry. Most of them worked for less than a minute on any given piece. This process seemed inefficient and its danger caused many accidents. The metal worker needed a computerized system
