Q: Crystal report errors in visual studio 2010. Why is this occurring? I have a crystal report error in VS 2010 and I don't know why. I have no idea as to why it is occurring. In the below picture you can see the error window pop up. A: That is a crystal report error... Here is a link to some information on how to fix: Below is a quick fix (although I would check the first solution first, just to make sure you fix everything: Right click on the window Select "Reset window location" This will reset Visual Studio back to the point you were at when the error occurred. Should fix the issue.

Q: Secure PHP script I have a PHP script that gives a value back to an AJAX call. Now I want to secure this script so that it can only be accessed by the user that requested the ajax call. I was thinking of saving the session variable (that the ajax call made) in the database. Then to have this session variable in the new session and use it. However I am not sure how this would look in code. I know PHP has the $_SESSION superglobal to use $_SESSION['somename'] = $value; However can I pass the session variable of the user that requested the ajax call and use it to my script. Or do I do what I suggested to do and also use a session variable (the session that the user made). This latter case seems to be odd to me. A: To do this you would have to check the request and take measures based on it. If you're going to save your request data, you might as well just do your work without a user id. In your case, after your AJAX call, which gets the data back, you can then return in a header the current logged in user, who you can then use as the data provider for whatever you're doing. // =====
